Jewish leaders call for UK's Labour Party to act on anti-Semitism 'cancer'

London.—Almost half a century ago, when he first became an active supporter of Britain's Labour Party, Rabbi Abraham Pinter said it had far less of a problem with anti-Semitism than the country as a whole.

But while other political groups have recognised the need to address prejudice against Jews, Pinter said the country's main opposition party was stuck in the past.

Labour now faces accusations of anti-Semitism in its ranks - from its high-profile former London mayor Ken Livingstone, who said Adolf Hitler had supported Zionism, to students at Oxford University. This has fanned concern among Jewish communities already alarmed at increasing levels of hate crimes.
